The text by Ian Wright titled "Zero-Waste grocery stores" and published in "The News" deals with the problem of overconsumption of plastic. The author implies that packaging waste worries people's minds, but, fortunately, measures are being taken. A new supermarket ^{called} Live Zero appeared in the author's neighbourhood in Hong Kong, so he decided to learn more about it. This shop is part of "zero-waste" movement which is aimed at ending packaging waste. Raphaël De Ray, the owner of another such store, believes that this movement is highly likely to improve current situation, as more and more zero-waste shops are popping up, as well as people's awareness and desire to cut down on the consumption of plastic are growing. I am personally glad to know that nowadays more humans are starting to think about ecological problems and possible consequences of their actions. I believe that the markets I have mentioned above have a great impact on the situation and can help to save the planet from plastic.

I suddenly turned into a book lying on a table in an unknown for me room. I was terrified. I remembered lying in my bed at home trying to fall asleep and the next moment I had no idea where I was. Maybe it was just a dream? Yes, of course, what else could it be? I calmed down and started looking around. Surprisingly, I had neither eyes nor a nose, but still was able to see and breathe. The room I had found myself in turned out to be a garage. It was full of different pieces of strange mechanisms, electronic devices, and books stored in big piles right on the floor. In the center there was a huge machine I had never seen. It looked like a ^{cabin with} chairs with lots of mechanisms connected to it. Big pieces of paper were attached to the walls around it. I was trying to make out what was written there when I heard two male voices outside:

- Why is the garage opened again?! - the speaker ~~was~~ seemed to be very angry.

- Come on, who do you think is interested in it?

- You're too irresponsible, Fred! We can't let anybody know we're doing a time machine. If someone steals it it will be the end of our lives!

"So it's a time machine. How interesting," - I thought.

Meanwhile, the men entered the garage and sat near the mechanism. The first one went on scolding 2 Fred, who just started to do something with the machine. Soon the two partners were working in silence, having no idea about being watched.

I didn't know ~~how~~ how much time had passed since their arrival, but suddenly Fred cried loudly: "Finally the last part is in the machine! Now it's time to test it. If we succeed our photos will be in every single newspaper. John, do you realise it?" He had dark hair, black eyes, and something Greek was seen in his profile. "He will definitely look good there," - I thought. Though I wasn't sure that was also true about his partner John, whose ugly teeth spoiled the whole face.

Fred and John got into the cabin of the machine, pressed some buttons and the whole garage became filled with yellow light and flashes. I thought I would become blind, even though I had lost my eyes.

Suddenly I woke up in my bed. I touched myself and realised I had turned back into human. "So it was a dream, what a relief!" - I thought and went to the kitchen to get some food. I turned on the TV. "The invention that has changed the world! John Orwell and Fred Williams have constructed a real time machine!" - said the reporter. I quickly looked at the screen where there were that very two men from the garage. It wasn't a dream...
